Windows Virus Protection Suite for your PC, home or.Q: Best way to debug a spinlock for an embedded system I have a tiny embedded system that uses a bare bones Linux kernel (2.6.31). Currently, I am having the occasional high-to-very high CPU utilization problem when a thread is waiting to acquire a spinlock from another thread. The reason for this is that the kernel allocates memory to threads when the thread is created. I need to create the memory, but I am trying to avoid doing so as it is very expensive. When the thread is finally spawned, it returns back to the bare bones kernel to sleep until it is scheduled. I have set up some heartbeat code on this system to get a real-time indication of whether a memory allocation is going to fail. Here is the code that is in memory and does not go out to the network. I have verified that the memory does indeed not exist by the heartbeat. /* this bit isn't really helpful for debugging, but at least is useful in * generating a unique heartbeat after the fail */ static char *heartbeat_location = 0; static void heartbeat_timer(void data) { / explicitly clear the heartbeat location so all threads reusing the * heartbeat resource will try to allocate a separate memory location */ heartbeat_location = 0; heartbeat_expire_now = 1; } static int heartbeat(void *data) { if (heartbeat_expire_now) return (heartbeat_location)? 0 : -1; heartbeat_expire_ 3da54e8ca3
