Many new types of integrated circuits (ICs) are used in the design of portable electronic devices. Integrated circuits include the following components: a controller, a memory (one or more integrated circuits), and input/output devices. A computer and logic devices may also be included in portable electronic devices. Depending on the design, different combinations of integrated circuits and devices may be present in these devices. For example, for cellular telephones, the memory may be one of more integrated circuits such as a non-volatile memory, a volatile memory, or both. The input/output devices may include one or more of the following elements: a display, a keyboard, a mouse, a microphone, an accelerometer, a camera, a speaker, and a keypad. The input/output devices communicate with the controller and memory, which may be for example an application specific integrated circuit (ASIC). In addition, some of the memories and/or input/output devices may be able to communicate with each other. For example, the display may be coupled to the controller and memory through a display interface. Similarly, the keyboard may be coupled to the controller and memory through a keyboard interface. Each of the types of integrated circuit in the above-mentioned ICs is unique in terms of the physical structure of the IC and the circuit layout of the integrated circuit (IC). The manufacture of the integrated circuits is typically in accordance with the particular specification of a manufacturer. In other words, each manufacturer of an IC has a particular manufacturing process for producing the ICs. The particular manufacturing process is usually defined as an IC mask set that provides the basic information for the manufacturing of the IC. Each mask set is followed by one or more iterations of the manufacturing process to produce different versions of the same IC that have different specifications. In addition, each IC mask set specifies different features of the IC to be made. These features are sometimes referred to as layout masks. The physical layout is defined on the mask set to produce the desired physical features of the IC. The manufacturing process can be quite complicated. The IC manufacturing process may
